A GLIMPSE INSIDE THE JURY ROOM

Time to reward Real Intelligence

CANNES. IT'S INSPIRING to see such great work and amazing talent together in one place every year. But if I was to be truthful, I'm filled with jealousy, as I see all of the incredible work I wish that I had done. I've judged a lot of shows but there is something special about Cannes - its diversity. In a room filled with people from Brazil, Norway, Nigeria, Columbia, Vietnam, Middle East, North Africa, Canada, Ireland and of course, India, I could see why Cannes is the biggest festival in the world. Allow me to give you a glimpse inside the jury room. In Print & Publishing, we saw three very marked styles of work. The first, and it is one that I love, was storytelling. Without a doubt, great stories made it to the stage. Artificial intelligence and other emerging technologies were also visible, but we were not going to award only technology. We wanted to award great ideas that use technology in innovative ways. Last but not most importantly, there was the classic print, which we all love. We were looking for those classics that inspire, with unforgettable visuals and powerful insights. The golden rule was, "Every piece that wins at Print & Publishing must have perfect craft, but just because it has perfect craft doesn't mean it's winning a Lion. Ideas rule this category." So, what were we looking for?

A couple of things: Courage: In the world of AI, going back to the roots of print is courage. Courage is not necessarily synonymous with technology. Technology changes, courage stays. Big brands. Bigger purpose: We looked for big brands doing purposeful work. Brands that invest in experience. A powerful piece that inspires the entire industry. Simplicity along with iconicity: The Grand Prix, 'Recycle Me' for Coca Cola is a reminder of the power of simplicity, purity and craft of print advertising. In a world that often gets distracted with technology, this campaign stands out because it is a classic. Realness: We wanted to send out a message - 'print is not a parking lot for scams'. It is where we celebrate the big brands who dared to be bold. After two full days of being locked in a room, endless discussions and coffee, we came up with 21 metals, which included one Grand Prix and four Golds. It was an extremely satisfying experience. An interesting phrase that we discussed was that the industry might not be 'post-purpose' at large. Not really. But meaning

STASHING BOXES OF injectables in their carry-on luggage. Buying counterfeit formulas online. Importing boxes from Europe. The race to secure blockbuster weight-loss drugs is pushing one of the world's largest population of people with obesity to creative lengths. Breathless media coverage has helped create a frenzy over the treatments. Such is the interest that the anti-obesity medication market could reach $130 billion by 2030, Goldman Sachs Research said. Indians, meanwhile, have simply been watching this from sidelines. The latest formulations, Novo Nordisk A/S's Ozempic and Wegovy and Eli Lilly & Co's Mounjaro and Zepbound, won't be available in India anytime soon, amid global supply shortages. For some buyers, that's not soon enough. They're turning to the flourishing gray market, where sales of imported bulk packs and alternative medications highlight the scale of pent-up demand and raise tricky questions about potential health risks. DRUG FRENZY The anti-obesity drugs market could reach $130 billion by 2030, Goldman Sachs Research said. India had third largest number of people with obesity as of 2022, behind China and the US, as per a Lancet study treatment clinic, Instagram-famous Dr Anjali Hooda sees celebrities, wealthy locals and expatriates, as well as Indians visiting home from abroad, who are trying to get their hands on weight-loss drugs. Women, largely between their 20s and early 50s, come seeking prescriptions, Hooda said. Hundreds of patients have sought prescriptions from her in the past six months, she said. In late 2017, Novo launched Ozempic—the GLP-1 drug that, while technically for diabetes, put weight-loss shots into the cultural consciousness. Then it rolled out Wegovy, which treats obesity. The two have raked in tens of billions of dollars in revenue for the Danish drugmaker so far. Eli Lilly started selling Zepbound in December last year—a weight-loss shot that's predicted to become the best-selling drug in history. The obesity drugs are now a global phenomenon and often in short supply. Novo Nordisk has "no plans" to launch Ozempic in India but is working to make Wegovy available, a spokesperson said. In India, the only drug available is Novo Nordisk's Rybelsus pill, which contains the same ingredients as Wegovy and Ozempic but comes in pill form. "It is not easy to procure them," Dr Kiran Kaur Sethi, the celebrity skin doctor who runs New Delhi's Isya Aesthetics, said of the drugs. "Many of my patients get it from their overseas channels." —BLOOMBERG

World T20: What Kohli's 5 runs from 9 balls say of India's batting

SANDIP G New Delhi, June 19

THREE INNINGS, NINE balls, five runs. The numbers tell a sorry tale of Virat Kohli's World Cup. But if there is a Kohli story that the cold, stone numbers don't tell, it is how he has been at the heart of India's brave new philosophy at this T20 World Cup. He has failed, so far, in translating the gung-ho approach into concrete runs, but that is only incidental in the larger scheme of how India is embracing modern ethos without dispensing entirely with the old-guard. Against Afghanistan in the Super Eight game in Barbados on Thursday, the bold punt taken by captain Rohit Sharma and coach Rahul Dravid would be tested. It really is about how he batted those 9 balls. Seven of them were attacking strokes. Three times he sashayed down the surface, once he shuffled too far across. Twice he looked silly in the way he got out—slashing a wide one against Pakistan and charging out to swipe versus Ireland. Despite his dismissal, the vibe he exuded was different to any he had in the past in the robes of his country. All-out attack doesn't come naturally to Kohli but that's the game his team wants him to play. Most cricketers grow more averse to risk the older they get, as they come to better understand the stakes they are gambling with, but not Kohli. The methods have worked as recently as the last edition of the IPL, and there is little reason those can't work in the West Indies, where the pitches wouldn't be as sinister as those in New York, even though the quality of bowlers would be an upgrade.

All-out attack does not come naturally to Kohli but that's the game his team wants him to play. The tracks in West Indies could get slower and the Indians could be better rewarded

All-out attack Not just Kohli, the pulse of the batting firm still, every Indian batsman has looked to common strokes straightaway, without fear and inhibitions. The surfaces in New York were not the perfect canvas for their intensive brushstrokes, but still then they did not shrink into their shells. They had the luxury of chasing low scores, against Ireland and USA. Against Pakistan, India were breezing at 89 for 3 in 11.2 overs, an impressive tally on a two-paced surface, before the implosion. So let the low totals not deceive the naysayers into assuming that India's batsmen have not shed their dated ways. On the contrary, they have married an ultra-aggressive course of action. Installing Rishabh Pant at No 3 might be the statement move of their new doctrine—and it has fairly worked—but Rohit Sharma too has not veered from early risk-taking, as he had in the 50-over World Cup. He unfurled the sweetest pick-up shot you could see off Shaheen Afridi, just the third ball he faced. You could say the ball was in his hitting arc, but to have courage to execute the shot against a bowler who has been his nemesis, and on a dicey surface, reflects his mindset more than his muscle memory. Easier in West Indies The tracks in West Indies could get slower and the Indians could be better rewarded. In this decade, India have won and lost three games apiece against West Indies, a team that is the third-best ranked in this format. In those games, India had just one total that was below 150. In 30 off 56 innings here, teams have posted 150-plus totals, a clear sign of boost for batsmen.
